WAR FINANCE U. S. PROBLEM

Holland Says Resources West of Mississippi Must Be Developed.

Twelve years after David A. Wells published the book in which he demonstrated that the resources of the North were so great that it would be possible to carry on the Civil War for ten years, even though the expenditure was as much as three billions a year, he spoke in private conversation of some developments of our natural resources that had been made between 1895 and 1915, the latter year being the one in which the conversation with him took place.

Although Mr. Wells referred to the new and in many cases unexpected development of our natural resources which was made within the ten years immediately after the close of the war between the States, for the purpose of making an argument in favor of his view that the United States should adopt as speedily as possible the policy of free trade, at least for the purpose of things he said are applicable to present-day war conditions. For it is to be upon the continued and increased development of our natural resources, especially west of the Mississippi River, that the Secretary of the Treasury must in great measure depend, indirectly at least, for obtaining funds, many billions perhaps, which the government will need if we are to carry the war to a triumphant conclusion.

Our Stupendous Resources.

Mr. Wells in the conversation also alluded to said that the extraordinary development of natural resources west of the Mississippi must be developed to late for him to include in his book published in the mid-years of the Civil War, would so enrich the country as to make it impossible for the government to adopt a free-trade policy. For these resources would after development enormously increase the wealth of the country. He did have knowledge of the mineral resources of California, played in increasing the wealth of the country by millions in newly mined gold from 1850 to 1882. But Mr. Wells had no idea of the wealth of California's resources or that, notwithstanding the falling off in the production of gold, nevertheless the state could produce within a generation a wealth in minerals alone, an output which in 1916 was of the money value of almost exactly one hundred and twenty-eight million dollars. He spoke of gold and quicksilver as the principal mineral products of California, then under development and also of the astonishing growth of that state as a wheat producer. He had no idea of the magnitude of the natural resources, not only of the mountain states, but also of that part of the country which was then commonly known as the Great American Desert.

California's Share.

California's share in the increased wealth of the United States is especially noticeable by reason of the fact that in that state probably a greater number of minerals are to be found than in any other. This is a long list of minerals, and experts are of the opinion that the investment of new capital in modern methods of wheat production will enable California to produce wheat of a prestige as a wheat producing state. She will certainly maintain her prestige so far as export of wheat is concerned.

California's development of the mineral resources of the mountain states, especially copper, has increased the wealth of the United States by many hundred million dollars. This wealth will either directly or indirectly be of service to the Secretary of the Treasury when he calls upon the people for new loans which may aggregate many billions before the war is closed.

Mr. Wells had faint, if any, conception of the part the Northwest, not more than a vague territorial possession of the United States, would play in the production of food. It was not until James J. Hill, and a little after him Howard Elliott and some others demonstrated the wheat-producing capacity of the mountain states that it was realized that this available resource in land, most of it secured as homesteads, would be so highly developed as to furnish an important part of the wheat and corn harvest of the United States. Nobody in Mr. Wells' day had any but the faintest conception of what the vast areas, which afterward became the States of Montana, Idaho, Oregon, and Washington, would be in the way of developing not only very rich mineral resources, but also, strangely enough, in so turning to agriculture that the State was to be listed as one of the important wheat-producing States of the Union.
